Historic mansions are endangered

By Fred Balugan (1981)

Porcelain Property, No Trespass

Each of the main doors to historic mansions and those that are inaccessible to the public is surrounded by three dozen iron railings that tick off the names of the owners andvo owners of the property. These railings are not for display, but for security. They are made of iron and are designed to prevent unauthorized entry. They are also used to discourage taggers and vandals.

Others, such as the newly built houses, have an aggressive array of deterrents and severely stigmatized areas. The house that is under construction is a part of the Stonewall District, which is surrounded by fences and fire hydrants. The house has several security features, including a high wall, a locked gate, and a security camera that is linked to the police department.

In some instances, the house is a part of the historic district. This is a good feature that can be maintained. If it is not maintained, the building can be left to deteriorate.

The major concern about old buildings is the cost of maintenance. The old buildings are usually in poor condition and require much work. However, the cost of maintenance can be reduced by regular inspections and timely repairs.

But the use of a wooded area is not restricted to the house and its surroundings. This is a common feature in many old buildings. The wooded area is surrounded by fences and fire hydrants, which are used to prevent unauthorized entry. The area is also used to discourage taggers and vandals.

The purpose of this article is to highlight the importance of historic mansions and the need for their preservation.